ARCHITECTURAL STYLE: Other: One- or Two-Story Brick Commercial

As newly settled American towns grew, commercial centers evolved from simple beginnings of a handful of wood-frame commercial buildings to more permanent construction in brick. One frequently seen building type, the one- or two-story brick commercial building, owed its appearance more to function than to the popular architectural styles. It may be recognized by its relatively modest scale, brick construction, and façade topping parapet which could be partially raised in a stepped or triangular pattern. Facades were generally finished with a different color brick than the common red bond used on non-public elevations. Fenestration was straightforward, with storefronts and display windows banded by transoms on lower stories and double-hung sash on upper stories, when present. Symmetry, with a central emphasis keyed by the parapet, was common. Architectural detailing, if any, was picked out by contrasting color bricks or by variations in brick patterns. Commercial buildings of this type began appearing in the late nineteenth century and persisted through the first two or three decades of the twentieth century. In later years, the building type was often adapted to automobile-related uses, such as garages and repair shops.

SUMMARY/CONCLUSION:

Included in the Santa Ana Register of Historical Property, the Busy Bee Market has been categorized as “Key” because it “is characteristic of a significant period in the history of Santa Ana,” as a rare surviving example of a significant building type, the neighborhood market. (Municipal Code, Section 30-2.2).
